

December 26, 2011

eForce Compliance Featured in Philadelphia Inquirer Article Regarding the Disposal of Electronic Devices

eForce Compliance, Philadelphia's first R2 certified electronic recycling company, was featured in a Philadelphia Inquirer article on December 26, 2011 addressing the recycling of electronic devices. As the holiday season ends the disposal of old electronic devices begins. With limited options available for recycling, many consumers simply stockpile the devices until a collection event becomes available. eForce aims to change this situation by expanding its community collection service offerings.

Beginning January 1, 2012, a new bill passed in Pennsylvania will charge manufacturers with the responsibility of collecting and recycling electronics in the State. Many manufacturers will rely on the services of local, certified electronic recyclers such as eForce Compliance to handle the details of collection. eForce, with a large network of community partnerships, is well poised to provide Philadelphia area residents with convenient collection options.

"We have been pleased that many local townships and civic associations recognize the value of working with a local recycling company whose founders have established roots in the community for nearly three decades," said Charles Nygard, Managing Director of eForce Compliance. "Residents are pleased to know that the collected material is processed in the Philadelphia area, creating jobs and in the process stimulating our local economy. They recognize the value of dealing with a company committed to their community," added Nygard.

To learn more about eForce Compliance and their eco-friendly recycling solutions, check out their website at www.eforcecompliance.com or call 215.964.6665.